Was Not a Bluff.

Having harped for months that Governor Harmon had not been able to make good his graft charge, certain Republican papers tried to convince their readers that it was all a bluff when he struck pay dirt in the old state house.

The Republican attorney general knew it was not a bluff when the Governor put the case up to him.

He lost no time getting into court with the suit Governor Harmon advised him to begin at once, and he has since been looking up the law to see how to proceed on other suits the governor advised him to begin.

Other Republican officials knew it was not a bluff when they held several conferences, according to a Republican paper, and decided to get behind the governor instead of in his way.

The man in the White House knew it was not "all wind," according to a Washington dispatch which says "he is not unconscious of the strength of Governor Harmon nor of the additional advantage which seems likely to follow from the governor's institution of large proceedings for the recovery of money from former Republican state officials which was collected illegally or irregularly it is claimed." You see Taft knows Harmon well enough to know that
